Jackson,

Don't even think about hitting delete. I'm sitting in your driveway right now, and I'm not putting this car in gear until you read this.

I've spent years in the front seat of this SUV, watching your back while you built Brighthouse Industries into an empire. I actually respected you. I thought you were a "genius." But I've realised your real talent isn't engineering—it's lying.

I know about you and Sarah. I know why you suddenly insisted on stopping at Capeville Cafe every single morning for the last six months. It wasn't for the caffeine. I saw the way you looked at her over the counter while I waited in the car like a loyal dog. I found the messages, Jackson. I know about the apartment you rented for her.

You think you're untouchable because you're the face of "the future"? You're just a man in a suit. And remember—I'm the one who drives that suit around.

But mark my words: You aren't going to get away with this. People like you think they're immortal until they aren't. I've spent three years learning your routine, your schedule, and every "secure" entrance to Brighthouse. I know where you're vulnerable.

Enjoy your sleep tonight, Jackson. It might be the last time you feel safe.

Josh Moses
